CHALLENGE

The golden throne chair of His Imperial Majesty was now in the center garden of his palace. The great ruler, Wu, was tired and ill. He had worked hard for his people. He believed in peace. Irrigation canals, good roads, and fair justice had been his gifts to his people. And now the security of his Empire was threatened. Mogus the Mongolian was ready to strike and destroy all he had worked so hard to build.

"We need time to collect your forces," said General Hu Chee to the Emperor. "I have sent messengers to the four corners of your vast lands. But before they return. I fear the Mongolians will strike at us. If we could only delay them. To hope for peace from them is in vain."

"The ambassador from the Great Mogus is about to see you," said Hsueh Po. "But he will not bow before you. Nor will he speak to you. He will draw a message on the ground. You have one day's time to understand it and answer it. If you can do this, he says that your wisdom is then something to be respected."

"Show him to me," sighed the Emperor Wu. "We have many learned men in my court. So I have no fear about this."

The Mongolian ambassador came to within a few feet of the throne chair. In his right hand he held a long stick. With it he drew a series of straight lines. Each one near the previous one. And they stopped at the feet of the throne chair. Then he turned around and abruptly left.

"Call Sing Pao," ordered the Emperor. "And see if he can tell me what these lines mean? They must not fail me."

But to no avail. Neither Sing Pao or the other wise men at the Imperial Court could figure out their message. And through the entire night many tried and failed. Just when all seemed lost, a young boy by the name of Tien Lui, who was a son of the gardener bowed before his Imperial Majesty.

"I know what these lines mean. But I can show the answer only to the Mongolian Ambassador. And if he continues, I know just what to do."

Emperor Wu looked at the little boy and told him to stand up straight.

"Who knows?" he sighed gently. "A little child may help us where adults failed."

The next day the Mongolian Ambassador came again to see if there was an answer to his message. The boy faced him.

"I am Tien Lui," said the youth. "I have been told by my beloved Emperor to answer you."

He then stamped out the lines with his sandals. In his hand he held a stick. He drew similar straight lines. But starting from the legs of the throne chair. To where the ambassador was standing. Then he stopped. One look at the Mongolian's face and it was evident that the boy had understood the message. And had also answered it correctly.

The ambassador then took some oiled rags, from a pocket of his long gown. Placed them on the ground. And with flint and steel, he started a small fire. The boy ran into the palace. He came out followed by ten servants. Each holding a burning lamp. He stepped on the rags and extinguished the flames. Then the servants placed the burning lamps in a circle around the ambassador. Again, it was evident he and the boy understood each other.

This time he took seeds from his pocket. Threw them on the ground. Again the boy rushed into the palace. And came out with two birds. They quickly ate up all the seeds. The ambassador looked at the Emperor.

"If there is such wisdom in a boy, what can we do against your people. It will be peace. We never break our word."

When he returned home, the ambassador spoke to his brother.

"When I drew the lines showing how our troops would advance to the capital, the boy drew lines showing how Chinese troops would advance to meet us. When I started a fire to show how we would burn their towns, the boy put out the flames. And showed how they would encircle us in a ring of fire. When I put seeds on the ground, the boy had birds eat them to show how they would devour us."

To his Emperor the boy explained: "This is a game we play called challenge. You meet lines with lines, fire with fire, seeds with birds, and figure out anything else that can happen. I liked the ambassador. He knew our game."
